The jury commented:

The competition submissions outlined a wide range of design solutions and a diverse set of ideas. They were impressively presented and set out innovative plans for new residential buildings from a broad global perspective. The sensitivity of submissions to the Buffalo urban context as well as the ability of high school students to construct the project were heavily considered during the jury review. The competition entrants presented a wide range of approaches to these issues, prompting interesting discussions among the reviewers.

We were delighted with the responses. It was a pleasure and an honor to review submissions by so many emerging professionals from around the world who enthusiastically addressed the issues of residential design in urban America.

2009 McKinley House organizers, collaborators and jurors thank all of our entrants for participating in the competition. Your time and effort are greatly appreciated.
