BERLIN

Visions for Leipziger Strasse

The Berlin task for the central Leipziger Strasse offers the opportunity to rethink a metropolitan traffic space. The Leipziger Strasse is to be defined as a model for the sustainable transformation of a main inner-city thoroughfare into a vibrant public space.

The need for climate adaption and the challenges of the mobility transition – e.g. through green-blue infrastructure – offer approaches for the transformation. What new functions and potentials can main roads develop as public spaces in the future?

LUSATIA

Transformation Lusatia – Welzow/ Město Wjelcej

2038 aims to end the active open-cast lignite mining in Welzow-South. The Lenné task seeks ideas on how energy and landscape, art, culture and tourism can provide new impetus in an area that has been heavily reshaped by open-cast mining.

The aim is to develop an innovative design and development concept for the town of Welzow/Město Wjelcej and the neighbouring post-mining areas. What can a model look like that leads Welzow/Město Wjelcej into the future and has social, cultural and touristic appeal?

BARCELONA

Green connection between city
and sea

Barcelona offers a green beach promenade with a wide range of leisure activities. In addition to environmentally friendly mobility and social open spaces, it creates benefits such as climate equalisation and protection against expected storm surges. However, there are still gaps in this linear space.

One of these is an 8-hectare concrete platform on the eastern edge of the city. This is to be transformed into a park with cultural or sports facilities. The aim is to create a connecting element that completes the beach promenade and creates a link to the neighbourhoods via green axes.
